

The -kan and -i split in Malaysian Malay and in Indonesian Malay
[for ISMIL 8]

Bambang Kaswanti Purwo
Atma Jaya Catholic University, Jakarta

Despite the case that there is no difference in the use of -kan and -i in Malaysian Malay (MM) and in Indonesian Malay (IM), as displayed by the verbs like menyelesaikan ‘to finish’, menyebabkan ‘to cause’ and menghadapi ‘to face’, melayani ‘to serve’, there are a number of verbs suffixed with -kan in MM, but with -i in IM, or vice versa.

- (1) ‘to lessen, decrease’ MM -kan vs. IM -i
MM: [...] dapat mengurangkan perasaan bosan (T264)
MI: mengurangi
- (2) ‘to find, come across’ MM -i vs. IM -kan
MM: [...] kita mendapatkan adanya sempadan morfem (DBJan92:199)
IM: mendapatkan

The -kan/-i split is also found in the use of suffixed and suffixless verbs, as exemplified below.

- (3) ‘to contain’ MM -kan vs. IM -O
MM: Surat-menyurat dimuatkan pada Bahagian Keenam (DBJan92:93)
IM: dimuat
- (4) ‘to create’ MM -O vs. IM -kan
MM: [...] seorang sarjana Korea [...] telah mencipta satu sistem skrip silabik (DBJan92:209)
MI: menciptakan
- (5) ‘to recall’ MM -i vs. IM -O
MM: [...] cuba mengingati kembali apa yang telah dipelajari sebelum ini (T244)
IM: mengingat
- (6) ‘to investigate’ MM -O vs. IM -i
MM: [...] mencuba menyelidik bagaimana wujudnya (DBJan92:32)
IM: menyelidiki

The present paper is an attempt to find out if there is a pattern in the -kan and -i split in MM and IM. Should there be one, could there be some underlying reasons or an explanation for such a split? The verbs under investigation are gathered from academic texts in MM (Suhaida Abdul Kadir’s PhD dissertation, Universiti Putra Malaysia, and articles in Jurnal Dewan Bahasa 1992).